

The guy is definitely all that. He has the looks, the shades, the perfectly fitted suit and there is nothing about him that says 9 to 5. Im still looking down but I can tell hes coming this way. The problem is, Im in no mood to be noticed. Im getting ready to give him the brush off when I notice the group of women next to me have all turned their heads in his direction. The ripple of excitement that goes through their collective lithe, barely clothed bodies is palpable. The dresses theyre wearing, like their facial expressions, look as though theyve been painted on. Oh my God, hes coming this way. She says it as though shes talking about a movie star. He is not. He so is. Shut up and let me do the talking. You shut up, he was looking at me. I feel relieved. Now I won't have to explain to this guy why Im not interested in talking to him. I look up again to see how this will play out, more comfortable as a spectator than a participant, but I freeze when I realize that theyre all wrong and Mr. Perfect is clearly headed in my direction. The attention of the group now turns to me, but I cant take my eyes off this guy. I want to look away but I feel that will look dumb, weak; as though Im pretending to be demure, lady-like, or some other clichéd adjective that does not apply to me nor which I will never fake. I keep my head high and hold my ground. Skank. Im tempted to respond to the crass remark, very tempted, but instead it galvanizes me into a course of action that I instinctively know I will regret. Hey, gorgeous, I think you got the wrong girl, the lead groupie chirps at the approaching man. He glances in their direction and gives them a smile that could win an award. Im not kidding, this is a money-shot, red-carpet, Hollywood Walk-of-Fame smile and it immediately disarms the predatory gaggle of females. It certainly disarms me... Warren Stone is living the life of a super rich, young, good-looking bachelor when he gets news that his estranged sister Miriam has left him a family in her will. Two young children to be exact, together with their nanny Joy Stephens, who will share their joint custody with him. Hes prepared to sign whatever checks he needs to, to see that theyre taken care of, but when he meets Joy, the nanny that comes attached, he changes his mind and begins to take a much more personal interest. A battle of wills ensues between the two over the welfare of the children while at the same time Warren is determined to add the attractive nanny to his collection of trophy girlfriends. Joy meanwhile is determined to resist his advances and keep their relationship professional, uncomplicated and to focus exclusively on the welfare of the children. With the attraction between the two growing to undeniable proportions and the children gradually working their way into Warrens heart, everything is thrown upside down when their biological father arrives out of nowhere to claim them back. Prepare for suspense, action, thrills, intense emotions and of course all of the sizzling heat that occurs between Joy and Warren as they get pulled deeper into the powerful attraction between them.

Stolen is book one in the Billionaire Lovers series of romance, unexpected love and intense, steamy encounters between hot, powerful men and the virtually defenceless but strong-willed women they desire.
